I would rather read Transformers: Age of Ultron Fanfiction while getting beaten by the police than open the covers of this pageslush one more time.4 of 12 people found the following review helpful. TO FIND MERIT, READ BETWEEN THE LINESBy Everett HaywardThis book is by far the most opinionated, liberally biased, and at some points, outright disrespectful course book I have read. See almost any commentary on Justice Scalia's opinions. For the most part, the authors bury their obstinate opinions in the form of loaded questions after the fact--the most blatant example being in their commentary on "United Steelworkers of America et al. v. Brian Weber." However, if you are able to push through those failures and get a solid, unbiased view of the actual argument, then the book will provide you with a very strong understanding of the relationships between courts, agencies, legislators, and executives; the political processes that effect legal interpretation and construction; and the evolution of the court when it comes to these issues. I applaud the authors, in this respect.

This groundbreaking coursebook introduces students to the modern statutory and regulatory state. Authored by one of the founders of the legislation field and two leading scholars of Congress, it explores the regulatory state from the perspectives of Congress and agencies as well as judges (the traditional focus). The materials survey the empirical realities and rules under which Congress enacts statutes, the President and agencies implement them, and courts review agencies and interpret statutes. Importantly, this book examines the constitutional and functional structures within which Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court interact, making the book accessible to first-year students, with advanced options for upper-level courses in legislation and administrative law. The coursebook's unique, real-world focus on both the legislative process and the linkages between Congress and agencies sets it apart from more traditional casebooks and gives instructors useful materials for teaching the next generation of legislation, legislation-regulation, statutory interpretation, and administrative law courses.
