Krome This is a very well written, thought provoking, insiders view of just how our justice system works and how they can bury you and your reputation for life. I may be a bit biased, since I am married to the author and lived through it all. But regardless, read this book and you will learn, that truths spoken are not necessarily true. There should only be one version of the truth, but as most have learned, there are many versions, depending on who is speaking it. The first truth that wasn't true, came from the Defendant's client. The next version of the truth came from the Department of (In)Justice, the guiltiest of the bastardization of the truth. The DOJ will throw every possible charge imaginable at a defendant, hoping one will stick. If there is not enough evidence of wrong doing to support a plea, instead of throwing out the charge, it is common practice to make the defendant to admit more than they are TRUTHFULLY guilty of to accept plea. To me, this is perjury that is being suborned by our own government. But if the defendant won't agree to that, they must take their chances in court. And if you have multiple charges you are facing, with lengthy sentences attached, and you are not of the means to be able to spend $250K minimum on a trial, a plea is what you will agree to, even if the charges far exceed the actions you took. Welcome to the incarceration nation :). The media puts the last nail in your coffin with their TRUTH telling. Unfortunately news sources only care about the papers they sell, and the income they earn on their online blasts, without a thought whether the person they are dragging through the mud is innocent or guilty. Innocent until proven guilty is a myth, and always has been, made exponentially worse with the 24 hour news cycle, Google and all the other search engines. And since everything is searchable these days, and old, inaccurate stories don't get pulled, a life is destroyed in the process. We don't own our own truths

An interesting story that could have benefited by a more careful editing as well as a deeper analysis of the current criminal justice system

February 18, 2011. My life can be separated into two separate and distinct halves as of that specific moment in time. We are asleep. My wife wakes me up and says to me, Did you hear someone knocking? I am barely awake, but I listen for a moment and do not hear anything. Then the phone on the nightstand next to me rings. Six Federal Agents (U.S. Postal Inspectors) want access to my house for the purpose of arresting me. The Grand Jury for the United States District Court of the Southern District of Florida had issued an indictment against me, and five others, charging us with Conspiracy to Commit Securities Fraud, and other alleged criminal acts. My worst fear has been brought to life. How did this happen? How did I get here? I am stunned. This is my journey from the right side of the Bar to the wrong side of the Bar. An inside look at both sides of the criminal justice system all the way to prison and back.
